

ST GILES-IN-READING

The organ was built by J C Bishop in 1829, and rebuilt by J W Walker in 1867. In 1872 the church was rebuilt and the organ was moved from the west gallery to the north aisle of the chancel, where it was to remain for more than 120 years.

In 1888 the organ was again rebuilt by Walker, and it is essentially in this form that we find it today. However, the twentieth century brought various changes. A Trombone (prepared for in 1888) was installed in 1920, and the reeds were revoiced in 1950. In 1961 the manual actions were entirely replaced with electro-pneumatic mechanism; the actions for the Pedal Organ and drawstops remained mechanical.

In 1996 Harrison & Harrison were entrusted with the task of restoring the organ as closely as possible to its 1888 condition. Walker's work of the period was closely studied, and all replacements were made in matching style. New tracker actions were built for the manuals and for the pedal couplers; the console and the remaining tracker actions were carefully restored, and a new straight pedalboard was provided. Changes to the pipework since 1888 were reversed: the chorus reeds, which had been fitted with harmonic trebles, have been revoiced in the original style. New pipes were provided for the Swell Vox Humana and Pedal Trombone.

The organ was once again installed at the west end, in a new gallery designed by Roderick Gradidge. It was rededicated on 18th March 1998.
